

Acknowledgments

I would like to begin by thanking all the women who agreed to speak with me for this book. Thank you for sharing your thoughts with me, and for all the many ways you are working to get us to a greener world. You have given me hope.

Many people contribute to writing academic books—students, colleagues, and editors for starters. I am deeply indebted to all of my students for helping me practice presenting the ideas for this book during lectures, Canvas discussion boards, and informal chats in my office. In particular, I would like to extend a huge thank you to each of these current and former students for their research help: Mark Johnson, Victoria Potts, Molly Winders, Victoria Dowdy, Elane Westfaul, Meg Markin, and Andres Bosque. You were all so wonderful to work with.

I am so grateful to have what are arguably the most fantastic department colleagues that anyone could want. Thank you for your incredible support and friendship. I am also grateful to be part of multiple vibrant scholarly communities, particularly the global environmental politics and feminist international relations communities. It is heartening to know that there are so many dedicated people working with passion on topics that will make the world a better place.

I would also like to thank everyone at MIT Press. I am so appreciative of the opportunity to have my book join so many of my academic heroes in your catalogue. Thank you especially to Beth Clevenger and Anthony Zannino for working so patiently and diligently with me throughout this process.

Finally, thanks to my family. Your love and support mean the world to me. Thanks to Dursun for reading every word of my first draft. Also, while writing this book, I met my favorite person on this planet—my son. While he is still a few years away from being able to read this, I want him to know how grateful I am that he is in my life and how hopeful I am that his generation can overcome the super wicked problems that have stumped ours. Love you, little one.
